At this point, the day of the robbery, the Suspects could not have been identified by any means other than fingerprints. The fingerprints of one of the Suspects would have been on the money bag. The physical description of the Suspects would be complete and they would have been captured on video. The Suspects' name would have been discovered by witnesses. Finally, if the Suspects' DNA were linked to the DNA profile found on the money bag, their identification could have been confirmed. The fingerprint comparison would have shown that the Suspects were the perpetrators. The perpetrator's name and address would have been available through the record system. It was also possible that the driver's license number in the records would have connected them to the car in the parking lot. The description of the car in the parking lot would have been linked to the car the Suspects drove. The Suspects' DNA profile would have been matched to the DNA profile of the perpetrator. In short, the suspects were identified by all possible methods of identification. How can the state argue that such a physical description is not enough? Also, the property was found in the possession of the suspects. The fact that the state did not recover all of the money does not diminish the state's case. If the money was not recovered, there were presumably fingerprints on the bills and DNA on the bills. There was a match in the state's DNA database that would have linked the suspect to the crime and the money. And, the state can argue that the other cash found in the suspects' house was also obtained as a result of the crime. The facts as presented are not the "close to the border" analysis used by prosecutors in cases such as 82157476af
